ABSTRACT

This study provides first, a descriptive analysis, of participation through works councils. Secondly the study provides a survey of the level of, constraints on, and potential for, workers' participation in practice.

The study was conducted in eleven enterprises in Lusaka from May to October, 1978 plus a six weeks' study tour of the Central and Copperbelt Provinces. The methodology framework of the study includes literature review, use of official documents, questionnaires and interviews.

The study reveals that workers' participation was introduced in Zambia for both ideological and pragmatic reasons. Because of the ideological commitments to the philosophy of humanism, the ruling party (UNIP) and the Government initially wanted a radical type of workers' participation somewhat modelled after the Yugoslav system of self-management. However, the employers and the socio-economic conditions prevailing in Zambia during the 1969-71 period (when the legislative process was underway), suggested caution and put pressure on the Government to finally adopt a moderate model of workers' participation similar to the West German Scheme of Works Councils.

The evaluation of workers' participation in practice demonstrates that workers are rarely informed, consulted and involved in co-decision to the extent envisioned by Part VII of the Industrial Relations Act. The main constraints on participation according to the study are; unfavourable management attitudes, inadequate support from Government and other institutions for participation, legal complexities and contradictions, and irrelevance of the type of issues discussed in Council meetings to workers' immediate interests.

Unfavourable management attitudes are caused by the managers' ideas about participation. Most managers think that participation negated corporate autonomy, has no immediate value, and is an unwanted bother. Such negative attitudes frustrate the rank and file and curtail the level of workers' participation in management. The problem of legal complexities involves the existence of a veritable maze of work rules, regulations, articles of labour, and company legislation beyond the workers' control. The problem of inadequate government support stems from lack of resources. This problem has affected the seriousness with which workers' participation has been taken by both employees and employers and has delayed the consolidation of participation.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.

This study is the result of the combined forces of academic interest and self-reliance. However, it has benefited from the interest and assistance of individuals in the Department of Social Development Studies and the University of Zambia in general for the sponsorship funding and the provision of supplies and secretarial services.

Academically, in particular, my gratitude is to Dr. Marina Ottaway and Dr. Peter Hayward who kindly consented to the time consuming task of being my supervisors in the research upon which this dissertation is based. My debt of gratitude to them, is for their patience, and the rigorous academic criticisms of my work which have been of inestimable value in my study.

I am also grateful to Mr. Robin Fincham for his encouragement in the conception and development of the study. To members of staff of the Department of Social Development Studies, I should like to acknowledge a special debt for their open willingness to discuss some of my work and for their constant encouragement. In particular Dr. N.L. Lifanu, Dr. J.K. Ngwisha and Dr. C. Dillone Malone. I am equally grateful to Mr. A. Kanduza of the History Department for the various forms of assistance rendered.

I would also like to thank the Departments of Labour and Industrial Participatory Democracy, the President Citizenship College, the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions and the Zambia Federation of Employers, for assisting me in the process of my data collection.

I further wish to sincerely thank all the investigated business enterprises without whose co-operation, my fieldwork would have been impossible.

Last but not least of all I would like to thank Mrs. Beatrice Mwanamuchende for her conscientious and efficient typing of the eye-straining manuscript.
Much as I appreciate the assistance I have received from the various individuals and institutions, I hold myself responsible for the final document of the study.
CHAPTER I

Introduction.

The Research Problem

This dissertation seeks to provide firstly, an analysis of the essential features and the reasons for introducing workers' participation in management. Secondly, the dissertation deals with the problem of how workers' participation was introduced and institutionalised in Zambia. And thirdly it also provides a preliminary evaluation of the extent to which Zambian workers have actually gained effective participation in the management of their industries. Fourthly, the dissertation provides a preliminary enquiry and assessment of some of the problems encountered in the implementation of workers' participation. In particular the dissertation examines the influence of
